A fundamental aspect in the study of the self is the relationship between self and others. Several issues have emerged: does the sense of self depend on the relationship with the other? Or can one think the self logically, without reference to others? Is the social feeling towards the other innate, and how does the social self evolve? Is there a constitutional embodied otherness/ strangeness (Waldenfels) for instance in relation to double concept of the living body/ lived body or the body schema/ body image (Gallagher) or bodies in technology (Ihde)? What is the relationship of self/other in between existential incorporated feelings (Ratcliffe) of „otherness“ and external other bodies? Are our brains, social relational organs (Fuchs)? Are mental disorders social? What is the role of social interaction in diseases such as autism, schizophrenia etc.? What is the relationship between empathy and body language in social interaction? What is the relationship between sub-personal, interpersonal and personal in the social self? In sum: Do we become human/ a self by embodied social interaction? What is the role of the other in the concept of self?
